Personal values

after Hausler (2022, p. 118)

When you align your life with your personal values, it immediately makes sense. In challenging life situations (such as illnesses or job changes), values can change or shift in their prioritization. This is often when you really become aware of what is truly important to you. And that is precisely the key question if you want to find out your own values. It is also very revealing to find out what annoys you. If you are annoyed, this may be an indication that someone is acting against your values.

Answer the following questions with an open mind and from your gut.

What is important to you? Why?

What activities do you consider meaningful – in your own life or in the lives of others? Why?

What situations are you fully engaged in and forget about the time around you?

What really annoys you? Why?

Conclusion:
What are recurring terms and themes?
What values can you derive from your answers?
